WORLD VODKA

Vodka originated the northern European region. The Polish claim it was their discovery. The Russians will tell you it was theirs. Although it has been known by many other names, the name by which all know it today – vodka – is a diminutive of the word voda, which means water in Russian.

during the 17th century Poland began exporting their vodka to other northern European countries like Russia. By the 18th century their techniques had become much more advanced, with such practices as triple distillation. In Sweden & Poland, vodka was initially used for medicinal benefits before its celebratory use gained in popularity.

IRISH WHISKEY

In the 6th century AD, Irish monks journeyed to the Middle East and it is thought that it was there they observed how the alembic was used to distill perfume. On returning to Ireland they invented their own version, the 'pot still', which they used to create a new spirit known as 'uisce beatha', the water of life.

BOURBON WHISKEY

As with French appellation wines, there are strict laws governing just what a bourbon must be to be labelled as such. Bourbon must be aged for a minimum of two years in new, white oak barrels that have been charred. Nothing can be added at bottling to enhance flavour, add sweetness or alter colour. Though technically bourbon can be made anywhere, Kentucky is the only state allowed to put its name on the bottle, and as Kentucky distillers are quick to point out, bourbon is not bourbon unless the label says so.

SCOTCH WHISKY

Few would venture to assert the precise moment at which Scotch whisky was first distilled. The exact origins of distilling are obscure and it is unclear precisely when the techniques first reached Scotland's shores.

What is certain is that the ancient Celts practiced the art of distilling and had an expressive name for the fiery liquid they produced – 'uisce beatha', the water of life.

Over the years the Scots have perfected the art of distilling, using elements so generously provided for them by nature.
